

Cafe Review

Venue: Boston Tea Party

Date: 19 February 2011

Reviewer: Charlotte Araya Moreland

Boston Tea Party - you know the place- it's the flash new tea shop on the high street. The one where the smell of sweet mocha-chino wafts out the doors into the breeze...the one with the oh-so-tempting triple chocolate muffins spilling out of their cases, just waiting to be eaten...the one you sat out side the other day, and watched that posh businessman come out of, stuffing his face with that grilled panini, then that little kid who was clutching an iced bun with sticky fingers came out after him, and you were trying so hard to resist the temptation of losing it all together and ripping the bun out of her hands.

Still not want to make you go in there and push your nose up to the cake counter and feast your eyes on pies and cupcakes? Go completely OTT and splash out on an extra large hot chocolate with whipped cream, marshmallows and then order a chocolate fudge cake as well? Well you are missing out!!

Upon entering Boston Tea Party, we were greeted by the smell of fresh tea and coffee, and went straight to order. As there was no obvious place to queue, we went up to the counter, where we were rather rudely told that the person was busy serving another customer, and to wait. After ordering my generously sized take-away tea, I waited for my friend, who was standing at the counter waiting to be served by the worker, who was standing with her back to the customer, chatting away loudly to her colleague about how bad one of their teas was(which was not fabulous for publicity). When she did realise that she needed to serve my friend, she did not apologise but went about business as normal.

Deciding that we did not want to sit in the tea rooms, as there was not enough seating down stairs, we took our food outside. The tea was absolutely delicious, and of a very high standard, even if it was extremely over priced.

Over all, Boston Tea Party is a splendid cafe, with lovely interior designs, just hinting at tea plantations and old English tea rooms, and their teas, coffees and pastries are fabulous. I would highly recommend Boston Tea Party, and the bad service we experienced is almost worth going through just to taste their wonderful cake and drinks. As my friend summarised for me, "I thought Boston was a lovely cafe, and I would definitely go there again, but being served within the hour would have been nice."

*The Young Reviewers Club is run by The Unit, 17 Endless Street, Salisbury, SP1 1DP.
For more information or to book our young reviewers and photographers please get in touch*

info@unitspace.org.uk
01722 341408
www.unitspace.org.uk

